

How Gran'daddy's Came to Be

As a child I spent my summers on my gran'daddy's farm in Tennessee. That's Gran'daddy Tillman pictured on the back, along with my Gran'mommy and my mother, sitting on the steps of that big ol' covered porch that's so much a part of Southern culture. Food is also a big part of Southern culture and barbecued and smoked foods were everywhere. Some of my first, and fondest, memories of food are of seeing my grandfather working with my Uncle Brown hanging hams over an old well to cure them. Then there were the turkeys smoked over a little old homemade brick smoker. I still remember his hands, knuckles gnarled with age, as he fed perfectly dried hickory into that old smoker. "Low and slow" he'd say. "Low and slow, that's the way to smoke it right." Perhaps it's the wonder of being a child and the fact that everything, even taste, is larger than life when you're so small, but those incredibly tender, melt in your mouth, morsels produced there in that old smoker have been improved upon with a few new smoking technique's added.

Now we've decided to turn our long-time dream into a plan – a business plan. Gran'daddy's Smokehouse and BBQ has been LLC'd. We're a business with tax numbers and a $25,000 smoker that will fill all the tummies in the area. You can see me unwrapping it in the picture below. Notice it's on wheels! There's a year's worth of hickory in the yard. Gran'daddy's looking down, and he's smiling
